Women artists are a relatively new phenomenon in China. Among other subjects they deal with issues concerning their own gender, in particular the status of women in present day China.

In her work Yu Hang deals with female nudity, which until recently belonged mainly to the realm of Buddhist iconography and erotic art. Her photographic works are carefully planned and staged, like in the Chinese Opera itself. The decorations on the graceful female body, as well as the calligraphy on the background are all designed by the artist. Whereas in the traditional Chinese opera female roles were always played by men, Yu Hang, being the director of the scene, takes the liberty of displaying a real woman, shamelessly displaying her nudity. In the past tattoos were part of the world of men, the 'tattoos' on the female body are another indication that the time for equality has arrived.
